FACILITATION IN ENGLISH AND IN FRENCH

Generations have mobilised so that society and its various institutions are open to all people regardless of colour, ethnicity or religion. There have been many victories, yet discrimination and racism remain a very real part of everyday life for too many people in our society.

Public schools are no exception. How do we recognize racism and discrimination in the education system? What are its effects on our children and on our society? How can we tackle these issues effectively, as individuals and as communities? To learn more and to share your experiences, join us at the popular forum "Are Our Schools Really Colourblind?". Meet parents and community members working towards greater social justice in our education system.

Fasal Kanouté, an education researcher, as well as David Dillon, education professor and popular educator, will help develop our understanding of these important issues.
