Regardless of where we come from or which social groups we belong to, schools ask us to change our habits, our ways of seeing and doing things. However, for all children to feel accepted and to have good chances of success, school must change too.

Do the school reflect our different identities (languages, styles of language, cultures, values, gender, ...)? How do we make sure that schools truly take into account different facets of our identities? What steps do we take to make sure that schools reflect who we are?

Join us at the Popular Forum "A school in our image?", with parents and community members working towards greater social justice in education.

Françoise Armand, language and education researcher, and David Dillon, education professor and popular educator, will help develop our understanding of these important issues.
