Do Montreal schools treat all children equally? In all levels of society, parents share the wish of seeing their children succeed, and put a lot of energy towards that goal. Why then are results so different at the finish line? What school practices contribute to inequality? Do all parents have an equal chance of seeing their children succeed?

Parents have vision and expertise that gain to be recognized. This forum is an opportunity for parents and for all other people interested in issues of social justice in education to come and have their voices heard. Together we will define what equality in education really means and afterwards use this definition to add a parent's perspective to the ongoing public debate on education.

David Dillon, professor in education and popular educator, will help develop our understanding of the issue.
